The First Bold Step

Report on the informal consultation process

Informal Consultation process

1. The leaflet 'The first bold step – proposals for consultation with staff on a new KCC' was published on KNet on Wednesday 9 September following agreement by private cabinet and the Conservative Group to this. Hard copies were sent to home addresses for all staff without access to KNet.
2. This was an informal consultation, not done to meet an obligation under employment law, and with no mandated timescale. Three weeks were allowed to the submission of responses from staff.
3. All staff were invited to respond with their views. Responses could be made electronically or in hard copy. Consultation closed on Friday 1 October at which point:
 - 4,000 copies had been distributed
 - 7878 copies were accessed or downloaded from KNet
 - 319 responses had been received: 41 in hard copy and 278 online
 - 170 staff members have requested to be involved in further activity to transform KCC.
4. Responses could be made anonymously and with the implication that staff could speak openly, freely and without recrimination. All responses have been read by Katherine Kerswell who has responded personally to every respondent who opted to include their e-mail address.
5. Comments were predominantly positive and supportive, though some questioned the value of consultation. Most welcomed the proposals for change and overwhelmingly recognised the need for change now. Many advocated a reduction in the cost and number of senior managers, or were fearful that the cost savings would fall disproportionately on front-line staff and service delivery. A large number of comments were specific to their service and directorate, often focussing on improvements to process and cost savings.
6. Comments were wide ranging. A summary of the responses is provided below from paragraph 10 onwards.

7. In addition to seeking responses by email and hard copy, feedback was sought from senior staff through meetings with Katherine Kerswell. In all, 242 senior staff were invited to, and 219 attended, 1 of 8 meetings between 9 September and 30 September at which Katherine presented and sought feedback on whether we should change the organisational framework in order to be able to respond to the very different policy and financial context facing us and our own plans under Bold Steps for Kent. Meetings were all held at Sessions House and each meeting included a question and answer session. There was a balanced mixture of all directorates at every meeting.
8. As part of each 90 minute meeting, feedback was sought from staff on:
 - 8.1. likes and dislikes – “how I feel about KCC”.
 - 8.2. their view of current KCC values in practice
 - 8.3. ‘horizon scanning’ - what risks did they see that would need to be recognised and managed as we transform the organisation.
9. Feedback was by individual rather than by groups, unprompted in that individuals could comment on any aspect of KCC, not prioritised or ranked or given a position in a range, and not moderated or challenged. The feedback provides a simple unedited snapshot of managers’ opinions of KCC and by implication of themselves. A summary of the feedback is below. It was very evident after the first two meetings that feedback from managers in each meeting was broadly the same in what it praised KCC for and what it criticised KCC for.

Summary of the responses from the Informal Consultation

10. The responses received to “The First Bold Step”, whether at meetings with managers or as written responses, are summarised below. Appropriate direct quotes are included in italics.
11. The following general themes were evident:
 - 11.1. There is appetite for change: we are realistic about the financial situation, and we accept the need to change and do it now. No one denied the financial situation or proposed delaying change.
 - 11.2. The engagement of staff in the process of change is seen as wholly positive and we want more not less communication. A very few individuals thought information was being withheld and that there were fake consultations when decisions are pre-made.
 - 11.3. KCC is seen as a good employer. There were a small number of negative comments, but the majority view was that we: value staff, value staff contribution; train staff, are a fair employer, a good employer, and have good pay and pensions, we are inclusive.

11.4. We like our colleagues. We are fair, kind, polite, fun, have respect for each other and are caring. We are principled, honest, show courage, are dedicated, committed and hard-working and we are a loyal workforce.

11.5. We are critical of our management style.

12. Our strategy was accepted. Staff showed their approval of the strategy through their endorsement of support for vulnerable people, support for the local economy and a desire, if not always followed through, to put the customer first. There were the following challenges to the strategy:

- in addition to tackling disadvantage we should continue to provide high quality services for the rest of the population
- we should not lose sight of children and young people's services as a priority
- our commitment to grow the economy should not be at the expense of the environment.

13. Our structure was accepted.

13.1. No one disagreed with a flat structure and no alternative types of structure were proposed. There were only three comments on structure and they proposed:

- three directorates: one for each of the three ambitions of our strategy
- KASS and Children's Services to combine
- the federated system be retained.

13.2. There was a very strong dislike of silos. Among managers 15.2% (i.e. 33) explicitly cited silos as something they disliked about the way KCC worked: it is sometime easier to work with partners than with other parts of KCC, silo mentality between directorates, silos within directorates; deliberately duplicate to self-protect, protect budgets rather than deal with problems. There were 2 comments that thought we worked well across directorates. In comparison there were over 50 comments to the contrary on silos, duplication and failure to share information

14. Our systems

14.1. While some thought we manage well, others were critical of the way we manage and are managed – and that criticism came from managers. We micromanage, we overmanage; we have top heavy oppressive management; we are obsessed with protocols and process and tick boxes. We talk big about empowering managers but it does not happen; we have a treacle layer which can be insular and resistant. There is favouritism, ego and he/she who shouts loudest gets heard. We are not decisive.

14.2. Gateways were welcomed. There were reservations about their implementation and whether staff will be adequately trained to deal with service issues.

15. Our shared values. No one thought we had a set of shared values, although some were confident they had a set of shared values within their directorate. No proposals were made for shared values.

16. Our style drew the largest response. There was broad agreement with the styles, but considerable disagreement over the extent to which we currently exhibit those styles. Below is a diagrammatic representation of where the responses fell:

16.1. We put the customer first

- Staff accepted this without exception as a style we should have for external customers, and showed a massive commitment to public service. But staff were largely silent on how we should treat internal customers.
- Many thought that we already put the customer first, but a substantial number thought we spoke of putting the customer first but in practice did otherwise. Specific comments were:

we are controlling; we pretend to consult; we don't really want to know what the public thinks.

16.2. We communicate as one voice as one unified organisation

- Staff largely accepted this as a goal. They want us to speak out for Kent as a whole and communicate clearly and more often. Some comments show discomfort over 'one voice' as it stifles debate and is Orwellian. One respondent thought we should retain separate cultures and styles.
- We are not a unified organisation as evidenced by the comments objecting to silos and duplication throughout the organisation. Autonomy and the flexibility to make local decisions found favour with a few respondents.

16.3. Cabinet and CMT work as a joint team with clear roles

- A small number thought the administration is clear about what it wants and liked the experienced leadership at MD level.
- But the substantial majority of comments were negative. No joint working with the senior leadership team; CMT in-fighting and 'them and us' between the centre and the directorates; too many plans and directives with mixed messages; business planning is meaningless and non-responsive; and we challenge Government on regulation but we still over-regulate and monitor internally. It must be noted that all of these quotes came from managers.

16.4. Everyone is hungry for continuous improvement

- Staff accepted this style without exception, but have polarised views on our current performance
- Many staff said we already practiced this style: we are innovative, creative, willing to change, forward thinking and willing to take risks and try new things.
- A greater number disagreed. Many thought we failed to innovate, others said we are big on rhetoric of creative and challenging thinking but the reality is we are risk averse; we are resistant to change; it has to be like that because that's how we have done is for years; governance restricts innovation; we don't deliver but strategise well; we fail to act on what we hear, we know best and fail to learn from the past; and we are sometimes dazzled by our own brilliance.

16.5. Our relationship with partners should be based on trust

- Staff accepted this style without exception, but we do not practice it. A few thought we work well with partners but most spoke of a poor relationship: we preach at prospective partners; we are autocratic with partners, we are dismissive of partners and districts, we think we know best and we are arrogant.

17. Our skills. The general view was that we value staff training and staff appreciate that, but otherwise this style generated little comment.
